Staggered Completion of the European Banking Union: Transposition Dates of the BRRD

Abstract

In May 2014, the European Commission published the Bank Recovery and Resolution Directive (BRRD). The directive introduces rules on bank resolution and restructuring including a bail-in tool. It constitutes the legal foundation underlying the Single Resolution Mechanism (SRM). Member countries of the European Union (EU) had to transpose this directive into national law by 31 December 2014 and implement the rules on resolution and restructuring of failing banks from 1 January 2015 onwards. However, many countries delayed the implementation. We assemble a dataset on national transposition dates of the BRRD across the EU-27 countries.

1 Background

The financial and sovereign debt crisis in Europe has ignited a concerted restructuring of the regulatory and supervisory framework of national financial systems. These reforms are part of a larger endeavor to create a European Banking Union (EBU) with shared micro- and macroprudential rules and procedures in place. To assess both the effectiveness and possibly unintended consequences of new regulatory architecture, evidence-based policy evaluation schemes require detailed information on the scope and timing of the de facto implementation of the various new rules that underly the EBU. In this technical note, we describe the national transposition timing of a capstone element of the EBU: the Bank Recovery and Resolution Directive (BRRD). We collect and provide national implementation dates from EURLex and official national websites, which have already been used to gauge the effect of the BRRD on banks' funding costs and the potential roll-over to the real sector (see Koetter et al. 2021).

On 15 May 2014, following a proposal by the European Commission, the European Parliament and the European Council issued the Directive 2014/59/EU to establish rules for the orderly resolution and restructuring of credit institutions and investment firms in distress. The responsible entity of the European Commission is the Directorate-General for Financial Stability, Financial Services and Capital Markets Union. The directive applies to all EU member states and had to be transposed by 31 December 2014.¹ The directive requires banks to set up resolution plans and allows the regulator to intervene if banks are distressed. If a bank is in severe distress and needs to be resolved or restructured, the national authority can apply a set of resolution tools and request a bail-in. A bail-in entails that losses of up to 8% of total liabilities are borne by the private sector instead of taxpayers (World Bank 2016a). The bail-in hierarchy stipulates that shareholders bear losses first, followed by subordinated debt holders and other creditors. Further resolution and restructuring costs can be covered by the Single Resolution Fund (SRF, for euro area banks) or national resolution funds (for non-euro area countries). The establishment of resolution funds is also part of the BRRD.

Whereas the European Commission has determined that all EU countries should have implemented the directive until 31 December 2014, most countries delayed the implementation. For that reason, the EU Commission referred six member states to the Court of Justice.² Therefore, it does not seem useful to use the EU-wide transposition deadline in any empirical analyses to assess the effects of the transposition of the BRRD. Given that the new resolution framework has already been applied in a few instances (European Commission 2019), but that further experience on the functioning of the protocols implied by the BRRD remains an important void to fill,³ we suggest instead to use country-specific information on the staggered implementation of the directive into national law. This void is the reason why the present technical note provides information on dates at the country level by augmenting official sources, such as EURLex, with manually collected data from national sources to provide a user friendly database.

A number of academic studies have already exploited the change in the regulatory framework introduced by the BRRD to empirically identify selected economic consequences. The dates employed in the respective analyses vary widely though. For example, Cutura (2020) exploits the deadline for the activation of the bail-in tool (01 January 2016) to study whether yields of unsecured bonds of banks maturing before and after that date behave differently. The study finds that bonds maturing after the bail-in tool should be in place show a higher premium compared to similar bonds maturing just before. For future studies on investor responses to new resolution rules, not only the official EU-wide bail-in deadline but also the dates surrounding it, which differ at the country level, might be used to gain a better understanding of whether official EU deadlines or national implementation of bail-in schemes drive adjustments of risk premia.

To assess the potential effects of bail-in rules before the BRRD was actually implemented across all EU countries, Schäfer et al. (2016) employ dates at which European banks were restructured, whereas the restructuring included a bail-in, as well as dates related to the legislation of the SRM. They find that European banks' CDS spreads increase by more after specific bail-in events compared to some legislative date. Giuliana (2019) exploits bail-in events and BRRD implementation dates in few selected countries to assess different patterns between secured and unsecured yields of European financial institutions. The author finds that the wedge in yields goes up following bail-in related (legislative) dates, which suggests that bailinable bonds face a higher risk premium given increased bail-in expectations.⁴

For many applied purposes, our database is superior compared to using EU-wide deadlines or specific bail-in events as we focus on the period, in which the BRRD has already been established, which allows assembling country-specific dates on BRRD implementation for all EU-27 countries. Consequently, in empirical studies assessing effects of the BRRD, we would suggest focusing on country-specific implementation dates rather than the transposition deadlines set by the European Commission as there is considerable heterogeneity in national laws implementing the directives.⁵

To that end, we have collected a dataset on different dates related to the transposition of the BRRD into national law for all EU countries. Our approach is in the spirit of Kalemli-Ozcan et al. (2010) who assembled a similar dataset for the EU-15 member states on the implementation of the Financial Services Action Plan and exploit the significant heterogeneity on the adaptation timing for their analysis of the euro's role for financial integration. This note details how we have assembled the dates and accompanies the dataset made available to the public on bankinglibrary.com. We also provide some descriptive analysis of the staggered transposition across EU member states.

2 Construction of the dataset

2.1 Data sources

The main data source is EURLex, which is a website that provides detailed information on the legislation processes in the EU, and it is run by the Publications Office of the European Union. The website lists for each EU country the dates when it communicates the transposition of the BRRD to the European Commission.⁶ EURLex is a convenient tool as it further provides the name of the legal document in the national language (as well as it provides an English translation). Thereby, we trace back the document on national websites.

However, EURLex is also subject to a number of caveats, which is why we complement the dataset with information from national sources. First, for some countries, EURLex lists many different documents. Hence, without further national information, the main law that implements the BRRD in a country remains occasionally unclear. Second, EURLex tends to list the date at which countries deliver the information of transposition to the European Commission. However, it could be that the country has published the legal document a few days before already. Third, for some cases, EURLex does not contain complete information and dates are missing. Therefore, we cross-check all dates, respectively complement dates, with information obtained from national sources.

⁶ See <https://eur-lex.europa.eu/legal-content/DE/NIM/?uri=celex:32014L0060>.

2.2 Dates

We collect three dates: i) the date at which the country transposed any legal document on the BRRD for the first time, ii) the date at which the country published the key law on the BRRD, and iii) the date of the last document related to the BRRD before further amendments have been issued. We always focus on the publication date of the respective document. Sometimes, the date of signature precedes the publication by a few days. We assume that the moment when the public got access to the document is more important for empirical studies.

As regards the content of the documents related to the three dates, we do not make specific restrictions. For the first and last date, the important issue is that a document has been passed irrespective of the relevance of its content. For the second date, we focus on the national law. In most cases, countries have passed one law on the BRRD. There are a few cases, in which no law has been passed but other legal means have been used (e.g., Italy commonly uses decretos legislativos for technical issues, in which case the parliament delegates to the government the power to legislate on a specific topic) or where two documents closely follow each other (e.g., this applies to Portugal, and we comment on such details in the accompanying Excel file). Some countries list more than one law on EURLex and we identify the crucial one to implement resolution and restructuring legislation for banks as also indicated in the Excel tables associated with this technical note. Note that even if a country has published a national law on the BRRD, the bail-in tool is not automatically activated.⁷ The document could contain further dates on the entry into force of specific contents of the directive. However, the European Commission requires countries to not only implement the directive but also to put its contents into force from 01 January 2015 onwards.

As regards the time span, we make two restrictions: First, we omit any dates listed in EURLex before the European Commission made the document on the BRRD officially available (May 2014).⁸ Second, we ignore all documents with a date after 2016. The reason for documents issued after 2016 is that the BRRD has already been amended occasionally and a few countries have already adjusted their national law accordingly.⁹ We focus in this technical note on the first round of transposition of the BRRD.

The final dataset contains the three different dates and is provided both in this document as well as in Stata and Excel format. We provide the exact publication date. Whenever we transform it to the quarterly level, we shift the date one quarter forward if the publication date is in the last month of a quarter. The reason is that for any analysis at the quarterly level, it seems unreasonable that one sees significant market reactions during a quarter in case the directive is transposed in the last month of that quarter. We realize that this approach might not be appropriate in other research contexts. This is exactly the reason, why we provide exact dates as well. Thereby, researchers can define transposition dates differently according to their specific needs. We furthermore save the name of the legal documents and the original documents, in which the publication date is explicitly stated. We provide references to these documents to verify the listed dates. However, we acknowledge that there might be further country-specific regulation that relates to the BRRD but is not reported to the European Commission and thus not listed in EURLex. This in turn could imply that we miss some relevant dates despite careful searching the web and not only relying on EURLex.¹⁰

⁷ Countries should have implemented the bail-in tool by 01 January 2016.

3 Descriptives

We describe next some key features of the assembled dataset. Table 1 presents the three key dates mentioned before: i) the date at which the country for the first time transposed and published any legal document on the transposition of the BRRD into national legislation, ii) the date at which the country published the key law on the BRRD, and iii) the last legal document available before 2017. Column 2 shows the national resolution authority responsible for the resolution action. Tables 2-4 show more details, such as the exact publication date, the name of the document in the national language, and a link to the respective source. The Excel tables are also downloadable and contain some more information on, for example, whether national sources have been used next to EURLex or whether there is some document available after 2016.

Figure 1 illustrates substantial cross-country heterogeneity of BRRD implementation delays based on the publishing date of the main law in the respective EU member state. Belgium, Cyprus, and Poland exhibit the longest implementation delays, whereas Austria, Finland, Germany, Hungary, and Slovakia implemented the BRRD directive without delays or before the official transposition deadline. The 27 EU member states implemented the BRRD with an average delay of 6.5 months, which is slightly below the EU average transposition delay of 8.4 months for current outstanding directives in other fields.¹¹

A detailed breakdown of the number of countries that delayed the BRRD implementation is depicted in Figure 2. Panel (a) shows that 81% of all 27 EU member states delayed the BRRD implementation. Panel (b) indicates that 89% of the implementers took less than one year to publish the main law of the BRRD relative to the transposition deadline set by the European Commission (31.12.2014).

Panel (a) of Figure 3 illustrates a country's BRRD implementation duration in months based on the country-specific difference between the publication date of the first legal document related to the BRRD and the date of the main law, with an average duration of 4.1 months. Panel (b) shows the time span (in months) between the publication date of the main law and the last legal document available before 2017, with an average duration of 1.7 months.

Figure 4 highlights the relationship between the different implementation dates. For more than half of EU member states (59%), the date of the first published legal document coincides with the publication date of the main BRRD law. This is driven by some countries having only one document on BRRD implementation, which is accordingly considered simultaneously as the first, the last, and the document representing the main law. Panel (b) indicates that for 15% of member states, the time elapsed between the publication of the first legal document and the main law is more than one year.

¹¹ The number is based on the 2020 Single Market Scoreboard of the European Commission as of 2017. Source: https://ec.europa.eu/internal_market/scoreboard/performance_by_governance_tool/transposition/index_en.htm.

Note: This table shows information on resolution authority and quarterly BRRD dates by country. Information on resolution authorities in column (2) is obtained from the European Banking Authority (<https://eba.europa.eu/about-us/organisation/resolution-committee/resolution-authorities>). Columns (3)-(5) show different dates related to the BRRD implementation process. The transposition deadline of the BRRD directive set by the European Commission has been in December 2014. The bail-in tool should be implemented by EU member states at the latest until 01.01.2016. Column (3) shows the quarter in which the first legal document on the BRRD has been published according to EURLex, and in column (5) information on the last date before the amendment is provided. Column (4) shows the quarter in which the main law on the BRRD implementation has been published by a country. In case a document is published in the last month of a quarter, the quarterly date is moved to the following quarter. The main source is EURLex as well as national official websites.

Note: This table shows information on the date at which the last official document before 2017 on BRRD implementation has been published by a country. In case the document is published in the last month of a quarter, the quarterly date is moved to the following quarter and indicated in the table accordingly (Column (2)). The exact publication date is shown in Column (3). The name of the document in the national language is shown in Column (4). The main source is EURLex (<https://eur-lex.europa.eu/legal-content/DE/NIM/?uri=celex:32014L0060>) as well as national official websites (see also Column (5)).

Implementation delay (December 2014 – date of main law)

Note: This figure shows the BRRD implementation delay for each member state calculated as the number of months between the BRRD transposition deadline in December 2014 and the date at which the member state published the main law on the BRRD. Source: EURLex and own calculations.

Delay

a) Countries delaying BRRD implementation (% share)

b) Delayed by more/ less than one year (% share)

Note: This figure provides information on implementation delays. Delay is defined as having published the main law transposing the BRRD into national legislation after the BRRD deadline has passed in December 2014. Panel a) shows the share of countries having (or not) delayed the implementation of the BRRD. Panel b) shows the share of countries having delayed the implementation of the BRRD by more or less than one year. Source: EURLex and own calculations.

Implementation delay (December 2014 – date of main law)

a) Time span between first date of legal document on BRRD and date of main law

b) Time span between date of main law and last date of legal document on BRRD Note: This figure shows BRRD implementation duration for each member state. Panel a) focuses on the difference in months between the publication date of the first legal document related to the BRRD and the date of the main law. Panel b) uses the difference between the date of the main law and the publication date of the last legal document related to the BRRD. Source: EURLex and own calculations.

First document published versus main law

a) First document published on BRRD and main law coincide (% share)

b) Time elapsed between first document and publication of main law (% share)

Note: This figure shows the temporal link between the publishing dates of the first legal document and the law related to the BRRD. Panel a) contrasts the share of countries for which the first legal document equals the main law with countries where the first legal document is not the main law. Panel b) shows the share of countries where the time elapsed between the first document and the main law on the BRRD amounts to more or less than one year. Source: EURLex and own calculations.
